Repression, eviction and dispossession in New Democracy’s Greece

The grabbing of private property and the struggle against auctions in Greece today

In recent years, the country has experienced a changing landscape in the field of property law, which has impacted the rights of homeowners and tenants. This is particularly evident in the process of dispossession and eviction of families from their homes. The struggle against auctions and dispossession has become a key issue in the fight for housing rights in Greece, where the majority of the population is facing significant challenges. The recent cases of auctioning homes and the eviction of families have sparked widespread protests and demonstrations across the country. The struggle is not only about securing properties but also about protecting the rights of people who have been living in those homes for years. The struggle against auctions and dispossession highlights the need for a broader discussion on the access to affordable housing and the protection of property rights. The struggle is not just about the rights of the current homeowners but also about the future of the next generations. The struggle against auctions and dispossession is a battle for the heart of the Greek society, as it reflects the deep-seated inequalities and injustices that persist in the country.
